Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: . . . the world to each other, at least I judge so from your letter. You need not worry as you know I shall try and do the best thing for both of us, but you know a man cannot love to women at the same time, any more than you could love to men. It is no use lying to each other. Of course the jury would infer from the letter of plaintiffs husband that the defendant was the one woman he loved, and from that they would probably infer that, since his affections were in such a state, the defendant was not without some blame for it. Indeed, we cannot resist the conviction from reading the evidence that a strong part of the plaintiffs case was the successful suggestion of the improper inference that the plaintiffs husband could not have been so greatly infatuated with the...
