Excerpt: . . . latter being laid in herringbone with a border of standard sized brick flanked with brick laid end to end. Each bell-trap at the intersection of the walks, instead of striking a discordant note, has been seized upon and utilized as a centre for a brick motif, which is consistently floral in design. One of the accompanying illustrations show a walk of brick, flanked by columns and roofed with vines, through which one looking down toward the lower garden obtains a vista of surpassing beauty. Interesting examples of the low garden wall are to be noted surrounding many dignified houses. Rough texture brick of varying shades of reds, browns and soft purples laid in Dutch bond with cream-gray mortar gives charming effects absolutely in keeping with the houses. The illustrations of our American gardens accompanying this article show a few of the many delightful effects obtained by the landscape architect, and while these particular examples are probably more pretentious than would be aspired to by the average country resident, at the same time their artistic treatment tends to show the added interest and attention which is being given to this very essential part of the home. As a rule the average householder does not possess sufficient acreage to contemplate the layout of a vast garden with fish-ponds, rockeries and fountains, but he can make his ordinary sized garden a part of his home, and there is no reason why, with the exercise of thoughtful and...
