The industry, as such, is as old as our knowledge of brass and iron, the former having been made into castings from earliest times. Casting methods, however, have partaken of the general mechanical development of the last few years and today there is no comparison as to the quality of castings, the complexity of the patterns cast, and the speed of manufacture, with the work of a few years ago. In this article the methods of hand molding have been carefully discussed, including the many questions of pattern construction which are more or less closely associated with foundry work. The presentation also includes the uses of the various types of molding machines, which have become so popular within the last few years. Malleable iron practice has now become well standardized and this type of casting, particularly for small work requiring much duplication, is very important. An excellent discussion of steel castings is particularly pertinent as this type of casting is fast displacing drop forgings for many classes of work. Altogether the article represents a well-rounded and thoroughly up-to-date discussion of...
