Bronze coin of Megara. necessary; he naturally sought them in the Pompeian party, where the ranks were so cleared that he saw no one who could prove an obstacle to him. He sounded Brutus. As nephew and son-inlaw of Cato, Brutus seemed to be the inheritor of his virtues, and ended in becoming the inheritor of his passion for that oligarchical government which restricted equality to a small number, but gave to those few men a singular greatness. He remained a long time without taking any side. Though during the first Civil war he had declared for Pompey, the assassin of his father, it was with very little ardor, for on the eve of Pharsalia, when all the camp was in commotion, he was reading and annotating Polybius. His mother, Servilia, had been the object of the most ardent and lasting of Caesars affections, and before the battle he gave orders that care should be taken to spare young Brutus. From Larissa the latter sent his submission to the conqueror, was received by him with kindness, and obtained from him the government of Gallia Cisalpina, although he had not before held any great office. He showed himself grateful, did not rejoin the Pompeians either in Africa or in Spain; and when the ex-consul Marcellus,...
